To despair, therefore,
is to despair over one's own self, one's own being, one's own existential condition.

The final thing to understand about Kierkegaard's analysis of despair—and this will be highly important for his analysis of the various types of despair—is that despair is universal.

It's the choice between the possibility of the "temporal and the eternal", "mistrust and belief, and deception and truth", "subjective and objective". These are the "magnitudes" of choice. He always stressed deliberation and choice in his writings and wrote against comparison. This is how Kant put it in 1786 and Kierkegaard put it in 1847:
